

1946 aerial view made by Abrams Aerial Survey, now Aerocon Abrams Photogrammetric Services, shows the houses on Prince Avenue at the end of World War II. In the next 20 years many of those residences would be razed to make way for modern construction. The aerial view serves as a graphic road map for the tour you'll never take. The vanished houses on the aerial view are marked to correspond with their addresses in the essay. Some extant buildings are identified by boxed labels to help orient the reader.
